Cuba - Latin America: The Cuban Government will provide guerrilla training and financial assistance only to highly developed subversive organizations.

Castro has curtailed support for guerrilla groups because of a lack of funds and the poor showing of leftist organizations in the hemisphere. Havana will reassess each Latin American country to determine whether its revolutionary potential is greater in urban or rural areas. Subversive groups deemed eligible will receive money and arms, and possibly Cubans to join guerrilla movements.

Fidel Castro apparently is optimistic about only two groups now operating in Latin America: the Tupamaros in Uruguay--with whom the Cubans do not have close relations--and the Lamarca group in Brazil. In addition, Havana continues to support the Rebel Armed Forces in Guatemala and has recently offered to train Hondurans in urban warfare techniques. More than 100 Hondurans have been trained in rural insurgency by Cuba.

Despite a somewhat stronger emphasis on urban terrorism, Castro appears to be maintaining a flexible policy on the export of the revolution.
